

Website Evaluation

The 2 sites I chose to compare are:

Artsonia (www.artsonia.com) and The Art of Ed (www.theartofeducation.edu)

Comparison

Both of these websites are huge and important websites for art teachers. I use both almost daily. They are both used for sharing resources and ideas and connecting to other art teachers.

Artsonia is more teacher driven. Teachers upload student artwork for parents and other family members to see. Parents can then comment or like the artwork and purchase items with the artwork printed on it. The artwork is also open for other teachers to browse and get ideas.

The Art of Ed is a great resource that shares blogs, podcasts, videos, and curriculum with art teachers from across the country. They offer classes and degrees in art education and host workshops all throughout the year. This is a great place for art teachers to really dive into art curriculum and connect with other educators.

Strengths and Weaknesses

Artsonia is very easy to navigate once you are familiar with the site. At first visit, it can be slightly confusing where to start. You are first prompted to create an account as either a parent, teacher, or student. Each account gives you a different experience. From the teacher site, it is very easy to upload artwork and read messages and comments from parents. The icons are large circles with words and pictures and each section is clearly color coded. There is also a link back to the home page, the parent page, and the gift shop. I feel like overall the site is very strong. However, the main weakness is not being able to see the parent site without creating a separate account as a parent. Sometimes I get questions about the site that I find difficult to answer because I cannot see it from the parent's point of view.

The Art of Ed is a very busy site. There is a ton of content on the main page that you can scroll through or filter by various categories. It can be a little overwhelming if you don't have a specific thing you are looking for. You could probably scroll all day and not get to the end. You can create an account but it is not required to look at content. You can also go directly to courses, workshops, or magazine from the homepage without having to click into a different menu. This site is very easy to navigate, there is just a lot of content. So, if you go into it to look mindlessly, you could get lost. I feel like you need to go in with a purpose!

Credibility

Both sites have a clear "About Us" section that gives phone numbers, emails, mailing addresses, and links to Facebook, Instagram, and Twitter.

Use Cases

Use Case: Lesson Ideas

Actor: A Teacher looking for art lessons

Basic Flow: Search lesson plans by medium, topic, and age range.

Use Case: Sharing curriculum

Actor: Teacher sharing lessons with families

Basic Flow: On Artsonia, upload pictures of finished artwork and put them into each individual student's account. Can also add standards, descriptions, and comments.

Use Case: Connecting lessons to standards

Actor: Teacher needing class objectives

Basic Flow: On The Art Of Ed, lessons can be filtered by curriculum standards for each state. It is clearly stated how the lesson ties into the standard. Teachers can print off the standard and explanation with the lesson.

Peer Comments

Hello Amanda,

Looking at The Art of Education, I agree there is a lot there and it does look a bit overwhelming. With all of the examples towards the bottom of the page, I can see how one would get lost. However, I do like the colors and layout, it is very pleasing to look at. It's almost like a bunch of art teachers created it! This website does seem to be very credible. They do not hide who they are, with the "About" at the top of the page, easy to access.

Looking at the Artsonia page, I found it a bit harder to use. In a way this page is the opposite of The Art of Education. The main page does not offer much for the new user except a video about the website. I wish that they did not make you have to sign up before getting to experience it. Also, I did find their "about" at the bottom of the page. They seem credible, but you have to make a slight effort to find it.
